SABINE WEISS

In the Sunshine of Life

NOVEMBER 28, 2020 - FEBRUARY 20TH, 2021

When I had to choose a title for this exhibition, I wanted to highlight the character of Sabine Weiss. Sunshine, smile, energy, optimism, dedication... there is no lack of qualifiers. Temperament, too! In the Sunshine of Life soon became obvious because it summarizes quite well her appetite.

As you will have understood, it is with great tenderness that we present at the gallery a new exhibition of Sabine Weiss, with well-known photographs, and some more unusual ones, and always composition and light as the key words.

Childhood's Art

PAR MARIE DESPLECHIN

There are objects everywhere in the little studio where she's lived for over seventy years. On the walls there are paintings, reliquaries and an extravagant collection of ex-votos that climbs like a Virginia creeper on the silt of the staircase. Polished stones in front of the fireplace, sulphides on a shelf, a mortar with a hole in the bottom, a mummy mask... 'I hoard stuff', states Sabine Weiss. The large, round stone that seems to have two eyes came back with her from Egypt. She offered it to Hugh, her husband, who asked her everytime she returned from a trip, 'Did you bring a gift for me?' She found the little Quran holder for him in Ramatuelle. She had the letters that were engraved in the silver translated: 'Let joy, happiness and love overtake you'. Each thing here has its story, and each story is precious. Sabine sets the holder back on the tray on the chest of drawers, beneath the staircase. She looks at it and moves it a few millimetres. She squints ever so slightly to check it's in the right place. 'Just yesterday, I was saying to myself, that's enough now! I'm always composing'. It's a habit she's developed over many years since she's become her eye.

She has the same look as she leafs through the proofs for this book. But this time, she hasn't left it up to others to choose the photos. She's taken on the task, reviewing her entire life's work. She stops, giving each image the affectionate attention that she grants to objects. 'Oh,' she says, 'I like that one a lot'. There are many reasons to like a photo: the model, the encounter, the story, the moment, the composition, the light, the miraculous convergence of all these elements. She sums up: 'I like my photos a lot; I'm very sentimental'. Her smile is malicious, and obvious too. Pages are lying about on the low table, displaying the passage of time. Sabine Weiss is ninety-six. She has been taking photographs since she was eleven. She began apprenticing at eighteen. She was a certified photographer at twenty-one. As a professional, she's 'done it all' from babies to the dead, photographs of paintings, perfumes and cognac, the wealthy in their lovely homes, models striking every pose imaginable... She's brought back photo-reports from the United States, Ethiopia, Portugal, Belfort, the USSR, India, Val-de-Marne... She's printed portraits of artists, writers, painters, sculptors, singers, some of whom were her friends. She also photographed Jean Monnet and Dwight D. Eisenhower. She's had prestigious clients, legendary magazines, well-known advertisers, a historic agency, in France and especially the United States. 'I've done everything', she repeats with an artisan's pride, mixed with the quantity, diversity and difficulty of the work she's tackled.

These thousands of commissioned shots warrant being the object of an inventory and an exhibition of their own. But this book presents Sabine Weiss' other world, the world of images freed from constraints, 'photos of one's own', as others have had 'a room of one's own'. The cherished visions captured during her photo-reports and the snapshots taken during walks, without paying much attention, when she would go out in the evening with Hugh, near her studio on the Boulevard Murat by the Saint-Cloud gate. Over the years, they've earned her a fame that runs parallel to and has ended up surpassing and even obscuring her success as an artisan. She greets it with a pleasure tainted with doubt. She's not sure she wants to leave the professional world behind for the world of art. She always remains guarded, 'Not an artist, not that.

Sabine Weiss has never wanted to be admired by the crowds. With a wave of her hand, she dismisses the idea that she could ever have sought such a thing. 'I didn't need it... I had work'. Nevertheless, three of her photos appeared in the MoMA's memorable exhibition from 1955, The Family of Man. The curator Edward Steichen, to whom she'd been recommended, at first gently discouraged her. She seemed so young. Thirty years old. Then he took a look at her dossier and changed his tune. So Sabine Weiss is not an unknown. She's had solo exhibitions, last year in Chicago, Minneapolis, New York, Lincoln. She didn't go to the openings. In fact, she didn't even see any of them. 'No time... I had so much work!' For her to finally contemplate her photographs on the wall, a group of friends, led by Hugh, had to organise a hanging in Arras, at the Centre Culturel Noroit, for and in spite of her. That was in 1979, when she was fifty-five. And even then... As she was getting ready to hand over her boxes of photos for the organisers to work through, Robert Doisneau admonished her: She absolutely must choose the images herself. She complied and made the selection from her collections from the 50s and 60s. The reward was immediate: enlarged, framed, hung, the photographs appeared to her 'as they should'. Doisneau, she states, helped her to see herself. To such an extent that she again adopted the practice that she'd given up for a good ten years, of refusing commercial offers, and set off cruising again. If she had to do it again, as she's often confided, she would give up commissioned work. No fashion, no advertising. Photo-reports, strolls, encounters, that's what she would do, exclusively. A life entirely devoted to the pleasure of seeing. 'I delight in being obliged to look', she says. A life of delight.

A fantasy. For how else can we free Sabine Weiss' non-commissioned work from her life in constraints? How can we understand the singularity of her photographs, their integrity, their slightly rough quickness? Weiss pauses over one of them: 'I like this one a lot. It's very bad technically, but this gentleman leaning over to buy a sprig of lily of the valley for his kids...' It is said that in order to free oneself so happily from technique, one really has to have mastered it. Sabine Weiss has practiced so much that she can see without seeing (everything). Her compositions defy clarity and blurriness, details, people crossing a field. 'You can't predict anything. You do what you can. We're dependent upon chance. I like that'.

Because it is free of ambition, Sabine Weiss' work escapes both manufacturing and anecdote. Its coherence is not to be found in a project, but in a placement. It resembles its creator, whatever her reservations about considering herself an artist. It might be that the word 'artist' lacks something that would do justice to the industrious quality of photography, which after all cannot trade in whimsy since it is first and foremost an art based in technology and chemistry, an art of making. (...)

Sabine Weiss has photographed many children. Professionally, she's been asked to do so a lot, perhaps also because she's a woman. But there's something else. Everywhere she's gone, from India to Saint-Cloud, she's brought back portraits of children. Her photos are not particularly 'cute', nor even evocative. The children are represented raw, as full-fledged people, captured in their social, cultural, family truth. Funny or heart-rending, they exist as actors in the world. She remarks that, 'I'm not too far from all that', and it's probably to the persistent vigour of her own childhood that she owes the integrity of her gaze. She knows like no one else how to photograph children because she is their equal.

Sabine Weiss does not recall ever being impressed by her models, even the most illustrious ('Marshall Juin was very nice'). Yet she says, 'Children don't make you scared; they're not going to smash your face'. Looking at her photos, she observes that 'Many children, many elderly people, maybe they do more interesting things than adults'. Vagrants too, bums, gypsies, 'simple' people. 'Working-class areas move me. They're not pretentious. I don't manipulate them'. She, who's photographed so many of the world's happy people for magazines, seems to find a form of peace and tenderness on the margins of triumphal, adult society. That's where she pauses, moved by a gesture, an attitude. She chooses 'people on the outside', 'people on their own'. 'You know', she adds, looking at her work, 'it's never very cheerful'.

For all that, indifferent to the maelstroms of her century, Weiss has never 'meddled with politics'. Is Switzerland to blame? 'We never talked much about politics back home; we lived quite calmly'. In the long interview she granted Amaury Chardeau for France Culture, she settled the question: 'I'm not militant. I'm not a feminist. I don't even have the words for that sort of thing. I'm very committed to my own life, in my photography. In the end, I'm a very self-centered person'. She also says, 'I'm not fervent', which describes her perfectly.

As she'd have it in fact, it was simply a coincidence of timing that placed her in the school of humanist photography along with her friend Robert Doisneau and all the others such as Willy Ronis, Brassai, Henri Cartier-Bresson, and so on. She met others, without ever connecting with them. She doesn't need a group, and in any case, she has Hugh. She doesn't think they've had any influence on her work. The only person who did was much earlier than them: August Sander, the great German portraitist from the beginning of the last century. She definitely admires him. 'Very simple. Very head-on. That definitely interested me'. She herself has no hesitation in recognizing the documentary aspect of her work; she likes to 'bear witness'. And she steers clear of anecdotes like the plague. Very Sander. (...)

Sabine, who so heartily exists, says of her subjects, 'Photographing a person means making them exist'. Less in the image itself than in the moment of sharing, when one offers her eyes and the other his gaze. Again and again, showing another photo, Sabine Weiss narrates a similar situation:

Childhood's Art

PAR MARIE DESPLECHIN

'And her, she was so happy, she needed someone'. There is no hint of arrogance in this universal sympathy established as a method of approach. More like an inexhaustible jubilation, born from a shared vitality. Something like a joyous redemption, a double redemption, on both sides of the lens. 'Maybe I'm kind deep down', Weiss quips, with a naughty smile. 'Maybe'.

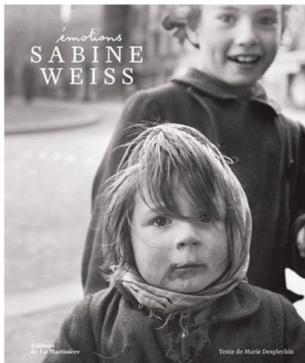

'Oh really? You've heard of me?' Sabine asks, doubtfully. 'I'm not that well known after all...' When I object, she seems stunned. Then she closes the chapter murmuring, 'Very well, very well. That's great...' She organises the proofs of the forthcoming book on the table in front of her. 'These are Sabine Weiss' choices. I included the photos that I like. I tried not to select well-known things'. She corrects herself: 'Yes, all the same... I tried not to disappoint'.

WOMEN IN MOTION 2020 AWARD

In partnership with Les Rencontres d'Arles, the 2020 Kering Women In Motion Award for photography has been given to Sabine Weiss.

In March 2019, Kering and Les Rencontres d'Arles announced their partnership agreement and launched the Women In Motion program at Arles. This led to the creation of the Women In Motion Award for photography, to be held every year in recognition of the career of an exceptional woman photographer. The award is accompanied by €25,000 in prize money for the acquisition of works by the winning photographer for the collection of Les Rencontres d'Arles. In 2019, the inaugural Women In Motion Award went to American photographer, Susan Meiselas.

Kering is also collaborating for the first time with the Paris Photo art fair for photography. As a way of furthering its commitment to women photographers, the Group is supporting the Paths Elles X Paris Photo 2020 exhibition organized by France's Ministry of Culture. With the cancellation of the traditional Paris Photo fair at Le Grand Palais, a digital exhibition entitled Paths Elles X Paris Photo has been created at ellesxparisphoto.com. The website includes interviews with around 30 women photographers about their status as female artists, their commitments as activists, and their sources of inspiration.

Sabine Weiss, the winner of the 2020 Women In Motion Award, will also feature on the website.
